Gender equality: key to unlocking health for all

Gender equality must be at the core of health for all

Unless every woman and girl has access to quality and affordable health care, unless women and girls can freely exercise their sexual and reproductive health rights, unless all women and girls are treated and respected as equals, we will not achieve our 2030 agenda.

Gender equity remains a stubborn challenge especially in the health sector, where women make up 70% of the health workforce, yet they hold only 25% of senior roles. Gender norms and stereotypes, discrimination, and sexual harassment contribute to gender pay gaps and inequities, threatening the delivery of health and hampering our goals of health for all at all ages.

WHO applies a gender lens to all its work

WHO works to provide and promote sex-disaggregated data, as well as looking at the ways that gender inequalities interact with other drivers of health inequalities such as age, ethnicity, level of poverty or geographic location.

By analysing disaggregated data we can understand the causes of ill-health, identify what drives people to seek health care, and see how the system responds.

Applying a gender equality lens also means engaging with men and boys as well as girls and women.

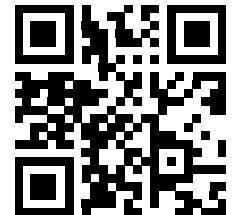

WHO is committed to gender equality

Gender equality is a priority in the WHO's "triple billion" five-year strategic plan. The Director-General is committed to gender-parity in leadership and approaches to reduce gaps in gender parity in staffing are in place.

WHO WHO is walking the talk with 80% of the performance indicators of the UN System-wide Action Plan towards gender equality and the empowerment of women (UN SWAP) either meeting or exceeding the requirements in 2016.

"To deliver health for all we must prioritize gender equality"
